The Tale of a Mighty City.

Thomas Keensight, a manufacturer, entered his office this morning and had just purchased three business lots in the new C.P.R. Terminal. He was looking out of pure curiosity at the wonderful operations which the C.P.R. were performing, and at this terminal city of the Pacific coast, became imbued with a new idea offered to a man in these days.

"Just think, I got three lots on one of the main streets for my business," said Mr. Keensight. "If one-half of the work that the C.P.R. can do here, Coquitlam will be a city of at least ten thousand or more in time that the C.P.R. did not own the property which they were leasing. The Great Northern railroad has now purchased this property, therefore, made it necessary for this big Transcontinental Railroad to have shops and trackage, but also for their terminal elevators and could unload the products of the eastern hemisphere to be carried to the consumers of British Columbia and the great Prairies east of here."
